

When in April sweet showers fall
That pierce the drought of March and all
The veins are bathed in liquor of such power
As bringeth forth the engendering of flower

And the small fowl are making melody
And sing away the night with open eye
-as nature pricks them and their heart engeages-then people long to go on pilgrimages.

Geoffrey Chaucer (1343-1400)